asserting what is not true in order to gain the patient's confidence." A singular case, bearing in some degree on the right to mislead a patient, was described a few months ago in a public address by a well known American dector. A young lady in one of the western States was convinced that a bristle of her tooth brush had become embedded in her throat and was causing mischief there which would terminate fatally if the foreign body was not removed .-The family doctor, and after him several physicians of repute, examined her throat, and all agreed in assuring her-which was really the case-that there was no bristle there at all. She continued to grow worse, the imaginary bristle causing all the effects which a real bristle might perhaps have caused; at any rate, all the effects which she imagined a real bristle would cause. At last a young surgeon was consulted, who tollowed a different line of treatment. Looking long and carefully at her throat, and examining the ifil oted part with several ics:ruments he at last gravely assured her that she was quite right; a bristle was there, and the in-tlammation she experienced was undoubtedly due to it. He could not, he said, remove the pristle at once, as the only instrument which would effectually reach it was at home. He want home for it, as he said, but really to enclose in an instrument of suitable form a bristle from a tooth brush. Raturning, he carefully sipped the skin of the throat where the young lady felt the pricking of the non-existent bristle, and after that this time the operation of extracting the oristle was certainly in progress, he w.thdrew he instrument in triumph, and along with it the bristle, which had indeed first entered her mouth in that instrument's company. Fro n that time she recovered rapidly. For it will be understood that though there was no real cause for her fears, a real protestion had been excited by them, and creation muchief had resulted. The story ends here so far as our present subo: is concerned, though as a tale it may seem o many i complete without a few words more. The your g surgeon, we are told, was highly in favor theoceforth. He had not only saved her lite, as she supposed, bi: had stown her to have been right, and all her friends, as we las he other dee ors, wrong. She would have accepted his band but for the circumstance that, having a'r ady a wife, he omitted to offer it. Sno biszoned at read his fame, however, until he had bee me famous "throughout the whole State." All would have ented pleasantly had be not in a mement of weakness confided the true xplanation of the young lady's care to his wite-of course, under promise o' suiet sec esy--which, however, did not prevent the story from reaching the young lady's cars in a few hours. It is hardly necessary to say that therestorth her feelings towards the doc or

Kinney writes to the Yarmouth Herald: In the month of Jacuary, 1844, people r siding at Wood's Harbor observed a square rigged vessel at the Big Mud Island, then uninbabited, and, supposing her to be on shore there, a party of men went to the island in a boat for the pur

Dose of read ring assistance.
On striving at the is and they found the vessel to be at anchor in the Saub Cove, and there being every appearance of a gale from the southeast, they made signs to the crew to leave her and come on shore. In attempting to hoist out the boat she was stove and lost, and the wind and sea rising a line wis got from the vesselt a tree on the shore, upon which the captain and two men made their escape from the wreck, which was now stranded and fast breaking up. The remainder of the crew, consisting of four sailors, steward, stewardess, and one femal; pessenger (a girl of s xteen, and the now "petri fied woman') were droweed. Their bodies were found and buried nex; day on the rugged headland where they met their doom. There they rested for more than thirty years, when some modern Vandal was prompted by morbid cariosity to dig into the graves and disturb the last resting place of poor humanity is order to teast his eyes on the sight of a few mouldering he or they lighted on the grave of the girl and was no doubt surprised to find the corpse was hard and entire. The story spred and the cores; was due up from time to time by various persons. Even boys would pass a leisure hour when they landed from a fishing schooner by digging up the 'stone woman' and (xamining her. During this time I became propeircor of the island and resided on it and bearing from time to time of the diaging operations I rasolved to move the body to a place where it could rest in perce. I accordingly dug it up and found it in a perf c: state of preservation,

Every part of the body and limbs were as lierd as stone and about the color of gray marble. I attribute its pres avation to the presence I some mineral contained in the water in w pich the corpse was submerged, excepting the bead. I buried it decently within easy gunshot of my house, and am confident that I have put an end to the numerous resurrections of the perrified womac. The came of the vessel I have been unable to learn. She belonged to Windsor, N. S., and her captain's name was Card. She had come from Liverpool, Great Britian, to Spelburge, where she had loaded with dressed gracite to N . York.

THE AMUSEMENTS AT LEADVILLE. - One evening at one of the theatres a gentleman amused himself by pulling the chairs from under the people who sat before him. His victims may not have appreciated the joke, but the audience did, and their roars of laughter or couraged the man to persevere. He next blew out all the Alexandris, Virginia.
